

Your Capability Statement

This is your business card for federal buyers, and it's essential for getting your foot in the door.

What it is. The capability statement is a one-page summary of what your company does, who you've worked for, and why a federal agency should hire you. It's the most common document you'll share with government contacts. Think of it as your company's resume.

When to use it. You'll use this every time you introduce your company to a new agency or prime contractor. Send it before meetings, attach it to emails, and bring copies to industry days. It's a quick way for buyers to understand your fit and decide if you're worth a deeper look.

How to use it.

- Open the 'Editable Capability Statement (Word)' file first. This template gets you started fast.
- Fill in your core competencies. Use the buyer's language, not just your own. Look at agency solicitations and market research notices.
- Add your differentiators, relevant past performance, and all your company data: UEI, CAGE, NAICS codes, and any certifications you hold.
- Tailor it for each agency you approach. The 'How to Write One (full walkthrough)' has more details on customizing it. If you want a more polished look, check out the 'Branded Design Variants' files.

Watch out for. Don't just list what you do. Make sure your core competencies match the specific needs of the agency you're talking to. A generic statement won't grab attention.

Open it in your kit: <https://app.capturepilot.com/kit/capability-statement> Next step: <https://app.capturepilot.com/kit/past-performance> (Past Performance)